

Some Guidelines for Citations in the Text, APA Format (Williams, 2001)

Typical Style:

The development of orientation capacities in rodents has most often been studied using the Morris water maze (Morris, 1981).

An alternate style is:

According to Morris (1981) orientation capacities of rodents can be easily studied using the Morris water maze.

If the article you are citing has more than one author, cite them all the first time. For citations with more than two authors, you may use “et al.” for citations after the first one.

(NOTE: The phrase et al. stands for "and others.")

First citation:

For example, in the Morris water maze, all studies (Rudy, Stadler-Morris, & Albert, 1987) show that very immature subjects were capable of cue learning exactly like adults.

Later citations:

In learning a water maze task, infant rats first acquire the ability to use proximal cues to solve the task, and only later can use distal cues (Rudy et al, 1987).

When citing multiple authors, it is often awkward to use the alternate style shown above, as in:

Rudy et al. (1979) found that ... (You should try to avoid this awkward style!)

If you wish to cite more than one reference for a statement, use alphabetical order.

Reference memory seems functional as early as 15 days of age in the rat (Green & Stanton, 1989; Smith & Bogomolny, 1983).
